At Digithum, in our materials section, we strive to advocate the importance of the intellectual history, as a reflection on and rediscovery of where we come from, the authors that have had an impact on us, the giants on whose shoulders we stand to learn to think and observe, etc., to such an extent that, without them, we would not even be able to do so, or at least not in the same way. To this end, we have opened this subsection on the intellectual history that we will gradually fill out over the course of the next years. We mark the launch of this project with an extremely interesting piece, an interview that we have had the privilege to access thanks to its author, the Professor Emeritus or Sociology of the University of Leipzig, Georg Vobruba, who has given us access to a conversation he held with Hans-Georg Söffner and Thomas Luckmann, two of the key figures in social theory and sociology of the 20th and early 21st Century. In the interview, the two men express themselves frankly with complete trust and they give us some insight into their most current thinking (the interview took place in the summer of 2015); subtle, exceptional thinking that is not without its controversies.
